Those who braved the heat yesterday at the Polo Grounds witnessed one of the worst exhibitions of baseball ever played on those grounds. Chris Von Der Ahe's contingent of players from St. Louis crossed bats with the New-Yorks, and the home team made a sorry exhibition. Breitenstein pitches for St. Louis, and he held the New-Yorks down to ten hits, which netted 2 runs.

For the home team Jouett Meekin was the twirler. Meekin was very much off. The St. Louis team made 30 hits off him, which brought in 23 runs, 18 of which were earned. The hitting began in the first innings. Miller hit safely and reached first. Roger Connor, who was greeted with a storm of applause, advanced him a base, reaching first himself. Peitz sent the ball to the right field bleachers and brought in two runs.

In the third innings two more runs were made. Meekin, who appeared to be tiring, went all to pieces in the sixth innings, and was pounded for seven runs. Why he was not taken out no one but the management knows.

In the next innings the St. Louis players scored eight more runs. Meekin seemed to be exhausted by the heat, and several times staggered when about to pitch. The crowd was disgusted and hissed and hooted. They shouted for a new pitcher, but to no avail.

In the last innings the visitors pounded out four more runs. Roger Connor did the most work with the stick. He made six hits and scored four times. The score:

BROOKLYNS WON EASILY.

Kennedy Held the Pittsburgs Down to Six Hits

The Brooklyn team played a good game yesterday against Pittsburg and won by a score of 12 to 4. Kennedy pitched for the home team and did remarkably well, holding the visitors down to six hits, on which they managed to make 4 runs.

For Pittsburg, Colcolough was in the box. The home players touched him rather liberally, Anderson and Tredway making home runs. The Brooklyn earned 11 runs out of the 12 made. The score:
